ABOUT THE SEMINAR:

Several types of manufacturing, storage and control processes are used in industry. In the context of large quantities of the potentially hazardous materials and processes handled on routine basis, effective measures are required to be developed to ensure adequate controls and safeguards to prevent accidents having serious consequences upon workers, community and property. It is therefore, a high priority that hazards are properly identified and assessed for their potential to cause serious consequences.

Occupiers of factories are statutorily required to ensure safety and health of workers and protection of the environment. The Factories Act.1948, the Environment (Protection) Act.1986 and Rules framed under these Acts have elaborate statutory provisions on safety, health and environment. The occupiers have an obligation to comply with these provisions. This seminar help in standard, organizations should establish and maintain procedures to identify hazards and assessment & control risks related to their activities.
